Greetings,

My name is Haleem “Stringz” Rasul, and I am a dance performing artist, choreographer and artist educator. I am well versed with many popular urban dance forms; however, I am proficient in breakin’, house dance and a Detroit cultural dance style known as jit.

I discovered my passion for the arts and hip-hop at an early age. Growing up in Detroit came with its own unique challenges that served as motivators that manifested into creative and business ventures following graduating from Western Michigan University in 2001. I established Hardcore Detroit as a brand dance company and fashion label. The motto “hardcore,” represents success after struggle and overcoming hardships to achieve victory. By 2010, Hardcore Detroit was voted best dance company in the Real Detroit Reader’s Poll.

I learned discipline through the trials of everyday life and the intense ridicule of b-boyin’s only teacher: the cypher. I have instructed dance workshops internationally, judged and participated in dance tournaments throughout the nation gaining international respect, organized dance-related events in my hometown and produced relevant merchandising materials. I am currently a recipient of two distinguished grant foundations (Kresge and Knight Arts foundations) earning the title of dance ambassador of Detroit.

After exploring dance in other communities, I gained more appreciation for Detroit’s own innovations: and by March 2009, I tracked down the Jitterbugs, the group recognized for developing the Detroit Jit in the 1970s. Compiling exclusive interviews with them and other pioneers, I released a DVD illustrating the history of the jit through oral narratives, images, and never-before-seen footage. This historical project is complimented with a groundbreaking how to jit instructional. My creative direction was highly driven by the look and feel of Crazy Leg’s (Rock Steady Crew) film production entitled The Freshest Kids. His documentary embodies the story of the rise of the b-boy in a paramount fashion.

Jit, is a combustion of standing high energy footwork precision and arm syncopations that could be taken to the floor to create a dynamic aesthetic. The history of jit runs directly parallel with the original hip-hop dance form of breakin’. Both are creative expressions spawning out from the funk era and landing on the inner city streets reflecting conditions of their time. Breakin’ emerged from outside park jams in the Bronx, while Detroiters formed their steps at night under the streetlights and at basement parties. Both disciplines began to fuse various movements throughout its evolution. This artistic fusion is vital, placing jit underneath the umbrella of hip-hop, synonymously with other regions across the nation, each having their own unique narratives. These social links push innovation and ultimately becoming the arch of my teaching philosophy.

In 2012, I became the gateway for jit’s inclusion within the entertainment lineup for the Detroit Pistons that is greatly dominated by hip-hop culture. Jit became an instant programming favorite. For multiple seasons, I have shared the stage with classic hip-hop acts such as: MC Hammer, Doug E. Fresh, Vanilla Ice, Salt N’ Pepa, Naughty By Nature, Fat Joe, Black Sheep, Busta Rhymes and many others.

In August of 2015, the Zimbabwe Cultural Center in Detroit (ZCCD) working collaboratively with the Jibilika Dance Trust, sponsored a dance residency in Harare, Zimbabwe. During my month stay, I conducted research and interviews, led workshops in Mutare and other various towns. I was a guest judged for the annual Jibilika hip-hop dance competition held in Bulawayo. I collaborated with a selected group to perform for the opening dance act of the festival with jit set as the leading form of the entire piece. I was able to present my experiences and findings at the US embassy in Zimbabwe then later again this past December at the Skype and Mix Party held inside the N'namdi Gallery in Detroit. During my lectures, I used my own story of success and struggle to promote positive ideas that established the platform in which I was speaking from.

One Step At a Time (OST), is one of my simple approaches when engaging younger kids about dance. In my workshops, I encourage youth to take a physical first-step, then building up. Reflecting back on my previous accomplishments, I found that the first-step was the most difficult and one major step for me was applying for Red Bull Beat Riders in 2006 –

“Beat Riders brings together a handpicked international group of 30 of the best up-and-coming urban dancers to train and study with the founders of contemporary urban culture and dance.”

The beat rider's period allowed me to gain invaluable essentials from key pioneers of the hip-hop movement enabling me to reach further heights in my art and career path that I am now able to share with others.
